

Tsubame's Works

Tsubame tableware can trace its roots all the way back to the beginning of the Edo period, when the agricultural community began production of wakugi, traditional Japanese nails.

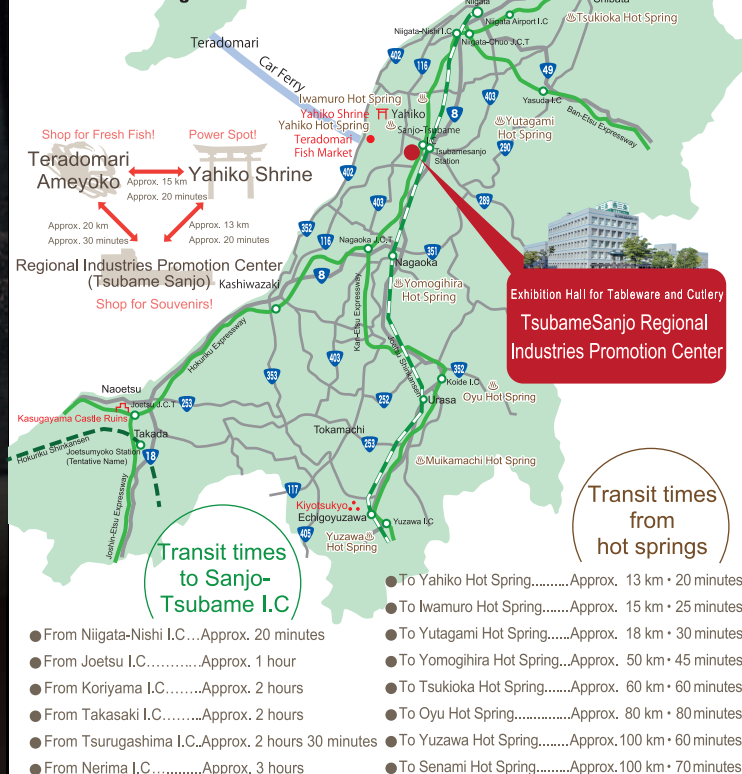

The blacksmiths continued on to produce metal files, smoking pipes, and cast copperware by the Taisho period. These metal processing technologies and skills led to the current production of metal tableware.

Tsubame's cutlery keeps more than 90% of market share in Japan, and has developed into a major production area, shipping goods to locations around the world.

Traditions passed down for generations
Feel it yourself by seeing and touching.

Sanjo's Works

Sanjo's blacksmithing traditions are said to have begun in 1625. In order to save the farmers suffering from the flooded rivers, Seibei Otani, the Izumozaki Magistrate, invited a nail blacksmith from Edo to teach and recommend the production of wakugi, Japanese nails, as a side business. Modern tools and knives that carry on the Sanjo blacksmithing tradition are well known all over Japan, and have become a specialty of Sanjo.

TSUBAMESANJO
